MEMPHIS APPEAL

THURSDAY, : : APRIL 25, 1878.

THE WAR SITUATION. is no peace. In the Balkans the population is rising against their conquerors, while there are signs of the Turkish government becoming disposed to adopt an English policy. England retains her ships in the neighborhood of Constantinople, fills up her garrisons at Gibraltar and Malta, hires vessels to bring Sepoy troops from the East Indies, fits up iron-clads, fills torpedo-boats with their explosive cargo, manufactures weapons, Wells were to confess that Tilden had been crowds warehouses with ammunition, buys swindled out of the place to which he was pense to render herself in every way formidable. But, while watching the Russians intently, she strikes no blow. Her policy appears to be to "wear out" her enemy. Russia has expended treasure, gone heavily into debt, and has lost much blood. England, fresh and hearty, and with full pockets, faces the conqueror, who is panting and exhausted from his recent struggles, but he does not draw a sword or fire a gun. She is there, armed to the teeth, bristling with hostile preparations, and because of her presence Russia cannot call home her troops, or weaken her defenses. She knows not the moment her fee may strike and aka metal. horses on the continent, and spares no exence Russia cannot call home her troops, or weaken her defenses. She knows not the moment her foe may strike, and she must remain in the field, keep up her garrisons, fortify her weak places, put her navy on a war footing—in short, she must send the expenses of actual war. She must send troops wherever England makes a feint, not knowing when the attack may begin nor where it may be made. She must be ever weaken her defenses. She knows not the returning-board frauds, is also an admitted fact. That the commission ruled according to a technical rather than equitable construction of their powers, has been accommunity to the returning-board frauds, is also an admitted fact. Russian credit is at a low ebb after the immense expenditures she has recently incurred, while England with a plethora of money, jingles her full purse with insolent confidence. Such weakest purse. The vast expense of occupying a large territory on a war footing present state of things be protracted month after month, and Russia must, at a certain point, inevitably accept conditions to which England would agree, and see the fruits of her late splendid achievements fade away like the morning's vapor. When two countries stand opposed to each other as Russia and England stand at this moment, there is not an hour when the combustible elements that excite each opponent against the other may not explode. An accidental event, a supposed insult, an impatient expression, even a groundless rumor, may be like a spark in a powder magazine, and the whole work of slaughter, blood and death may begin.
